

Gateshead, July 9, 1867.

My very dear Friend:

After receiving the kindest attentions and the warmest welcome in Manchester, I came here on Saturday afternoon, with Fanny and Frank, and have since been staying under the roof of my most hospitable and warmly attached friend, John Mawson. Yesterday we all went to Tyne-mouth, to see the ruins of the Priory, &c.; and had the unspeakable satisfaction of being accompanied by our beloved friends, Jane and Eliza Wigham, who are now fortunately visiting at North Shields, and with whom I am to spend this afternoon at Ellen Richardson's in Newcastle, preparatory to attending a complimentary soiree this evening. This privilege of seeing these dearly beloved co-adjutors has come most unexpectedly.

In order that you may not be in any suspense about our reaching Edinburgh, this is to apprise you that we shall leave Newcastle to-morrow (Wednesday) forenoon for Melrose, where we ^{shall} stop for the night, first going to Abbotsford, &c.; and on Thursday morning take the train that leaves Melrose for Edinburgh at 8.33, and is due at E. at 9.38.

Do not trouble yourself to come or to send any one to the station for us, as we can easily find our way to Huntly Lodge. Impatiently desiring to greet you, I remain, as hitherto,

Your most attached friend,
Wm. Lloyd Garrison.
E. P. Nichol.
